following the rule change, institutional ownership of publicly-traded partnership units increases from 11% of outstanding units to 24%. Utilizing a differences-in-differences setting, I compare limited partnership IPOs to industry-matched corporate IPOs. Prior to the rule change, IPOs of MLPs show no evidence of underpricing. The average treatment effect of the rule change is a 14% increase in first-day returns. Further, the cross-sectional variability of first day returns increased threefold, consistent with predictions implied in Rock's (1986) model of information asymmetry and adverse selection.
